Green Space

Did you know that your landscape can play an important role in reducing carbon levels in the atmosphere? Your green space presents a great opportunity to create a carbon sink right on your own property, which can help reduce the greenhouse effect. Two main carbon sinks that we can have are plants and soil, which take in more carbon than they release.

Biodiversity is best. When you have more species of plants above the ground, it encourages a more diverse environment underground. By planting native species and layering your plants, you are creating a low-maintenance system that helps conserve biodiversity and traps more carbon.

As individuals, it might seem like we cannot make that much of an impact when it comes to climate change but creating a green space that optimizes carbon absorption can make a big difference in offsetting our carbon footprint.
